

Incremental reading turns a long text into a series of short reviews. Each review reads a little, keeps what matters, and schedules the rest for later, so a reader works through many texts at once.

Extracting the passages worth keeping is the heart of the method. A good snippet stands on its own; a definition with its context is a fine example of one, and it is ready to become a card the moment it is clear.

A paragraph that begins near the foot of one page is common in papers and books alike. Whatever reads the text has to carry the sentence over the page break, past the footer of this page and the header of the next, without mistaking either of them for part of the paragraph itself. It ends here, on the second page, where the text picks up again.

Priority decides how soon an article comes back. A high priority keeps it close; a low one lets the interval grow quickly, so the reader sees it rarely until it has earned more attention.

Cards are reviewed on their own schedule, which spaces each repetition further apart as the answer becomes easier to recall.

The third page closes the fixture. It holds one last paragraph, so that every test reading this file has text on each of its pages.
