

A two-column page sets its text in narrow columns, which a reader takes one after the other.

The first words flow down the left column, an efficient layout, and a word that ends the column is hyphenated across the gutter. The right column then runs to the foot of the page, where its last sentence continues on the next page, past the page number and the header.

A new paragraph closes the fixture.